Virginia's Engines Not Properly Supplied by Boilers

BIG SHIP BACK IN PORT

Returned to Yard Early Yesterday Morning Bearing Marks of Severe Test—Why Contract Speed Was Not Exceeded by Big Margin.

Bearing the marks of an exceptionally severe test, the big battleship Virginia steamed slowly into port from Rockland, Me., yesterday morning shortly after 7 o'clock and proceeded to the shipyard, where she was moored on the south side of pier 5. As the mighty fighting namesake of the Old Dominion glided up the harbor she attracted considerable attention because of the fact that she did not present the same handsome appearance as she did on her departure for Rockland a week ago yesterday. Her three huge funnels presented a deplorable sight, all of the brown paint having been burned off, leaving the blackened steel plates exposed to view. The vessel looked as though she might have just returned from a battle in which the aim of enemy had been confined exclusively to her superstructure.

Not Enough Steam.

When the crew of the Virginia came out of the shipyard soon after the vessel had tied up at her dock, reports were circulated all over the city to the effect that the boilers of the ship were unable to furnish the engines with a sufficient amount of steam to drive them at the high rate of speed of which they were capable, therefore the warship was unable to exceed her speed requirement by a large margin.

Several well known men who were on the Virginia during the trial and who know whereof they speak stated yesterday that only once during the standardization trial did the ship's boilers furnish the engines 250 pounds of steam, the amount required by the government, and that was on the mile spurt when the huge vessel established the record for American battleships by doing 19.74 knots an hour.

During the remainder of the standardization trial and almost throughout the four hours' speed test, it is said, the boilers in the Virginia did not furnish the engines more than 240 pounds of steam and the engineers had hard work to keep the ponderous engines going at the rate of 129.5 revolutions per minute.

Before the Virginia left the shipyard for her official trial trouble with her boilers was anticipated by the shipyard officials, so it is said, and on the trial it was shown that the Nicholas type of boilers in the Virginia are unable to do as well under extreme pressure as other types of boilers which have been used in local built warships.

Under ordinary cruising conditions the Virginia's boilers showed up to good advantage and are said to be better than most other types. On the cruise down the coast during the return trip the boilers supplied sufficient steam for the engines and the big warship came down the Atlantic at a rapid pace, averaging 16 1-2 knots, which is exceptionally fast for a 19 knot battleship. On Friday the average for the day's run was 17 knots at 112 revolutions of her engines.

The Virginia arrived at Cape Henry yesterday morning at 2:30 o'clock and dropped anchor to await day break before proceeding up to this port.
